Abracadabra. A man is shot dead, no doubt about that. But from there, mirages. Nothing is what it seems and nothing stays as it was in this black magic of a mystery story. The only trust is love.

Jack Heath, freelance writer extraordinaire, known for his quick reflexes as much as for his reporting skills, arrives on the scene of his next assignment, writing a biography of a most successful chief executive, John Thatcher Webster. But Jack is not amused at what he finds as he gets out of the taxi. Even the cabbie is anxious to leave the neighborhood surrounding the dilapidated Versailles Plaza Hotel, despite its Long Beach address.

Seedy is a nice word for the place- Heath had been expecting something lavish, which he does find once he finally gets to the fifteenth floor of the Hotel where The Webster Corp. has its offices. After settling, reluctantly, into his dingy hotel room, Jack is reassured by the lush greenery, expensive furniture and large sculptures of the Webster offices, not to mention the starlet-like receptionist. He thinks it is like entering Oz directly from Kansas.

But this is the least of the surprises that await Jack. Here he is thinking he will make much money on the John Webster biography, even though his reporter buddy Ellie thinks he is selling out. And at the same time he hopes, if truth be told, to rekindle his romance with Louise, his long lost girlfriend, who just happens to be working in a book store on the harbor side near the Hotel. Instead, he is thrown into a maelstrom of death and disappearances.

While Jack is trying to unravel the mysterious death of John Webster, he comes across a woman, Elizabeth Byrnes, who, at first blush, seems off putting. But Beth is really just terribly confused, as confused as Jack is becoming, by what is happening. And Jack is more and more enchanted with her as they join forces to try solve the mystery that engulfs them. How much risk are they taking only time will tell. And what about Louise?
